

which constitute the system of rules which will, and always in accordance with the intention, be taken as the practical standard of right for the system of government, for the sake of its responsibility to the people.

There is also a form of the government which should be established, and which will be the practical standard of right for the system of government, for the sake of its responsibility to the people.

There is also a form of the government which should be established, and which will be the practical standard of right for the system of government, for the sake of its responsibility to the people.

There is also a form of the government which should be established, and which will be the practical standard of right for the system of government, for the sake of its responsibility to the people.

There is also a form of the government which should be established, and which will be the practical standard of right for the system of government, for the sake of its responsibility to the people.

There is also a form of the government which should be established, and which will be the practical standard of right for the system of government, for the sake of its responsibility to the people.

There is also a form of the government which should be established, and which will be the practical standard of right for the system of government, for the sake of its responsibility to the people.